Now Released - Thoro Packaging's 2015 Sustainability Report

Corona – NatureOffice's 2015 Sustainability Report for Thoro Packaging has been officially released. The report outlines the numerous ways that Thoro Packaging strives to be a steward for the environment. Among the many achievements that Thoro has accomplished are the addition of charging stations on-site for electric vehicles, use of vegetable based inks in printing, and many programs that encourage their employees to participate. Thoro's Employee Recycling Program involves employees in the sustainability process and has become an effective way of getting the message out about the importance of recycling. It has set off a chain reaction where employees are now utilizing good sustainability practices at home and other aspects of their lives. In this way, one of the most important aspects of Thoro's sustainability program is importance placed on education and responsible manufacturing.

According to the report, a significant way that Thoro has contributed to sustainability is through conservation. By replacing high energy consuming machinery and lighting with more energy efficient equipment, as well as replacing their exterior landscaping with plants that require a fraction of the water usage, Thoro Packaging has greatly reduced their carbon footprint. According to Thoro, however, this is just a single step in their journey. By implementing continuous improvement programs that concentrate on sustainability, it is Thoro Packaging's goal to one day soon become a "Zero Waste Facility."
